Miss Edna Wright, a motion picture critic and frequent contributor to The Herald's Motion Picture News, gives the following interesting account of a trip to the Kalorama studios:

"To an outsider," Miss Wright says, "it was a typical summer day, but as I left the street and entered the Kalorama studio my view of the day changed. Instead of taking one's time in order to keep cool, as the average pedestrian had to do, it seemed as if the heat was forgotten, as all was bustle and confusion. A scene was being set for a big drama, shortly to be released, and one wondered at the quickness with which a grass plot was changed into a ballroom scene of 1812."

"Mr. J. Rogerson, a leading man and director of the company, was busy rehearsing a scene, himself in a striking soldier's costume, ready for his part. Once or twice he rehearsed the players, and then the camera man started the machine, and the director was no more, but in his stead we saw the hero of the play."

"Yes," he managed to gasp between scenes, "acting and directing in the same picture is hard, but I enjoy it. Been on the stage in pictures all my life, so it comes as second nature."

"Leaving the studio yard, I next saw the dressing room, in one of which a group of actresses were making up. Again I found that the warmth of the day was forgotten and each player was laughing and chatting, unconsciously making an attractive picture."

"Among the taking of a quarrel among some soldiers, I left the Kalorama studio, and judging by the material I saw there, Washington is going to be proud of this pioneer company."

Many people write scenarios. In fact, almost every one who has ever written anything at all has at some time tried to write a moving picture scenario. There is, of course, a tremendous demand for scenarios by the many moving picture companies, but they never consider a scenario that is not arranged in proper form and does not comply with certain rules. has also advertised that it is prepared, through the head of its scenario department, to revise and properly criticize and select them for sale with different moving picture companies. This should be a great advantage to the many Washington writers of moving picture plays. The Kalorama Film Company is the name of the organization, and their scenario department is located at 1332 V street northwest.

stante on realism and a due regard for appearance. His actors must not only act the part; they must look it. Mr. Griffith was recently selecting the cast for a big Majestic feature when his gaze rested on Robert Harron. "You are just the man for the part," he said, "except for your weight. You are at least ten pounds too heavy."

No other member of the company excepted Mr. Griffith, and the question of completing the cast was left undecided. Mr. Harron that night went on a rigid diet. He ate only two meals a day, took reducing exercises daily, and in little more than a week he announced to Mr. Griffith that he had reduced his weight eleven pounds.

"Fine," said the director. "Now you are just what I want." "I feel much better than I did before I reduced my weight," said Mr. Harron. "I think I will be a little more careful hereafter and keep my weight where it ought to be."

"Bill" is Getting Busy.

"How Bill Squared It for His Boss" is the title of the second of the "Bill" series by Paul West, being issued in the Mutual program under the Komic brand. The office boy's intentions were the very best, but he failed to recognize his boss's sister, and when they greet each other affectionately the virtuous Bill is properly shocked. The boss' fiancée later arrives and is also mistaken by what she sees. Bill's versatility and cleverness straighten things out, and all ends happily.

Diamonds in Vest Pockets. Jewelers accustomed to handling precious stones become somewhat careless when they are likely to carry diamonds around in their pockets like penknives or toothpicks. This characteristically is used as the basis for the Mutual film "Jury and the Diamond." It is a story of a man who finds a valuable diamond out of his pocket when getting his handkerchief while taking a drink. The gem falls in cracked ice and is later found by a man who is in the same place to take a drink. The man's sorrow over the loss of his diamond because he can't find the missing diamond, and while he is nearly broken a tooth, he saves his job.
